

Identify The Structural Reasons Why Americans Are Less Likely To Vote Than Citizens In Many Other Countries.

Identify The Structural Reasons Why Americans Are Less Likely To Vote Than Citizens In Many Other Countries.

Voter turnout in the United States consistently trails behind that of many other democracies around the world. While various factors influence individual voting behavior, this article focuses on the structural reasons that underpin why Americans are less likely to participate in elections compared to their counterparts in many other countries. Understanding these systemic issues is crucial for fostering greater civic engagement and strengthening democratic processes.

Electoral System Design and Its Impact on Voter Participation